Photoshop also has its share of problems, but some of the problems come from Adobe. In many cases, there is zero documentation in the appropriate language for the feature, or it is unexplainable due to how the software "thinks". Every tool in the program has some quirks. "Layer Masks" have more complexities than a Rosetta stone. Most new features are slowly introduced in the quirks version before finally being all together. The appearance of elements supersedes user preferences and options. If you did not like the new look and the new way, you could uninstall the update, but you cannot uninstall a program entirely. That is simply not possible in today's computer programs. Maybe with CS4 we will get some sort of component upgrade option that will actually allow you to remove a section of a program from your hard drive. Photoshop Elements has a lot of potential going on in it, but as a 90 day evaluation it is lacking a few layers. I am not sure anyone would ever buy it after trying it without a proper 60 day trial, but if it were me, I'd do it. The trial version is a better idea than some of the options currently being used. Do not be fooled by the price. The 90 day program is the way to go for a novices like myself. It gives me a month or so to see if I really enjoy using it. Ok, ok, I'll say it, I'll admit it. I do not think it's a good idea to have to redo your editing process again. That is why I like Lightroom and other such programs. It "keeps" you from doing it again. Some say Lion is the solution. I think it's a more interesting problem when the software blames the user.

With the right software, you can take those ideas and concepts and bring them to life in a matter of seconds and have them come alive on the computer screen.
